It is the enterprising newspaper men that have a city branch office, where the outside of their paper is printed. They are constantly compelled to send away for paper, and if they at the same time can have the type set and the printing done on a portion of their paper, and at the same time by a compination of interests produce a more acceptable journal it is a piece of enterprise that should be commended. There are a number of well-disposed printers that do not like to have a part of a paper printed in a town or city distant from the house office. yet the same printers do not hesitate to send job work to distant places to be done. The objections are not well grounded.
