AMERICA is said to be the refuge for all people that are oppressed by state and church in other countries. But it is a forced construction to declare it to be a place of refuge for men who use bombs and infernal machines to explode among innocent people, under railroad trains, on ship board, and in populous places, where many people are killed and wounded. It is unfortunate enough when men that have been guilty of such things come to this country, and settle down quietly: they are bad men at best; but it is a great outrage when they come to this country and make it a headquarters, as it were, to carry on their fiendish work.

THERE are a lot of writers engaged at an effort to make it appear that General Grant is not much of a general. The critics will pass away like the mist of the morning, and Grant will live in history as the general that broke up the military power of the Southern Confederacy. The critics may as well direct their attention upon some other subject, for nothing that they can say or do can affect the military fame of General Grant.
