"Is this Mr. Eleazar Cone's house?" Click started, while the sudden color deluged her face. Absorbed in some entrancing day-dream, she had not heard the sound of footsteps on the short grass of the doorvard.

"Two gentlemen stood there-two specimens of the genus "Western farmer," but unmistakably from the East. Click looked down in dismay at the enveloping bib-apron, the soapy arms, the array of dishes, washed and other. wise, which surrounded her like crockery chevaux de frise. "Yes," she answered, faintly, "this is lost our way, after all," said the taller of the two, "My good girl," addressing Clarissa after a patronizing fashion "will you be so good as to take these bags?" setting his valises on the floor, "And if you could get me a glass of cool water, I should be a thousand times obliged. I suppose Mr. C ne is not in the house at this time of day, but he expects me."

"It's the professor!" thought Click to herself, more dismayed than ever.

For her father, chairman of the Board of Trustees of the District, had written to a Maine university to send them a competent instructor for the thriving young seminary, which had risen up like Jonah's gourd, in this Western wilderness. And Click had so counted on making a favorable appearance before this professo; and he has now taken me for the servant girl!"

But Mr. Cone's daughter was without a sense of humor; so she dropped a little courtesy, and said: "Yes, sir, certainly."

She took the pitcher and went out; and as she turned the windlass of the well with out, she could hear the guests in the kitchen.

"I wonder where the daughter is?" said the professor.

"The daughter? What daughter?" de manded his friend.

"Don't you remember some one told us Cone had a very tale ted daughter'
