As a matter of ethnological geography this division of the To the Editor of the Democrat and State was sufficiently interesting, but an additional interest accrued from looking at it from the hat standpoint. As a gen-eral rule, it may be accepted that hats are are, first, gratitude for the fact that I have made only for white men and that the supplementary classes wear them atter they have been thrown away, and that the read this statement against some of the negro, as a general thing, only arrives at a most deceptive influences by which they hat after it has been thrown away several times. Nobody but a negro cherishes a very old hat.

The Chinaman, it may be, buys second-hand hat, and, after ironing the brim out flat, wears it with decency. A red Indian begs or steals one, and, after cutting out a bole in the crown, stuffs the orifice with feathers and walks around the camp with much complacency. The mulatto, having found one lying about, washes it, ties a blue ribbon around 10 and wears it on Sunday. But the negro meets with an old hat and straightway puts it cn to as much of his head as it will cover. He does not try to improve it or to ornament it. When he first saw it lying in the road it was "an ole hat," but once his it becomes a new possession, and never grows any older until he finds another. And in America, scattered up and down the states, there is a prodigious number of them lying about, especially in the West, and most especially in the mining districts. It seems to be a point of honor among miners aut to wear second hand hats, for if they choose they certainly need never buy one. Perhaps they suspect old hats to be only some stratagem of the enemy to get them into a quarrel over the claim, either to it or semething else. At any rate, whatever the reason, they never touch them any more than a coyote will touch a dead Mexican. The Mexican, by the way, cats so much red pepper when alive that the coyote will not eat him when dead. So they say. ] The "colored man," however, does not frequent mines or he might revel in a new old hat every day. He prefers civilization, and the result, in matter of head-covering, is very striking. His appreciation of the independence of American citizenship leads him into the most complete rockiessness. There is nothing that he will not put on the top of his nead, provided there is only enough of it to assure him that it once formed part of a cap or a hat, and that he can balance the fragment on his head. In Texas and Arkansas his originality excels itself-he turns anything into a hat. I saw a negro sitting on a wood-pile, near Marshall, with the lid of a luncheon basket on his head and tied around his chin with a red ribbon. He was a single person, for he accepted the remarks of my companions in the kindest spirit possible, and told us he had understand. "another hat" at home. This was only his working day hat.
