THE TORN GLOVE.

It was almost 11 o'clock as I left my friend Alport's law office and hurried up town. I had delayed longer than I knew, interested deeply in his account of an intricate will case, in which he was just at that time engaged. As I now remember, a property of some two millions, held by a residuary legatee, had suddenly been claimed by one who announced himself as the direct heir and devisee, a nephew of the testator, who had not been heard from for several years.

Alport deemed the fellow an imposter, and although his story had been well told, and his plan of action became when the way. When he was well told, and his plan of action when the way will be with him. It is said by name don't begin with an L. he had secured proofs of its falsity. In fact, he had a bundle of papers containing the positive proof that Neil Harcourt was not Neil Harcourt, nephew of old Duncan Harcourt, testator; and it was his explanation of this case that had rendered me so late the river shore, in a small, old teneon my up town journey.

As I hurried onward, mechanically my hand sought my pocket for a cigar, and finding none-a most unusual condition or things-I glanced about a little off. for some place where I could purchase
