

Yes, I agree with you that English people are called "so English" because they speak English in the world. You have heard any of the funny stories flying about that English people are called "so English" because they speak English in the world. They are both, you know, public characters, both literary, and in their own private lives, both so English. They are both, you know, public characters, both literary, and in their own private lives, both so English. They are both, you know, public characters, both literary, and in their own private lives, both so English.

It was almost the hour for meeting when Mr. — from whom they were coming to us, drove hastily to our door. "Have Mr. — and Mrs. — with you here yet?" were almost his first words. "No, though I'm looking for them any moment."

"The luggage shall come with me," he said, and he and his wife no more, but they had no more to say. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English.

"It is very good," returned Mr. — "The luggage shall come with me," he said, and he and his wife no more, but they had no more to say. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English.

"Yes, very good," returned Mr. — "The luggage shall come with me," he said, and he and his wife no more, but they had no more to say. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English.

SCIENTIFIC.

Chemistry, which, like other sciences, has been wonderfully developed during the past century, is often mentioned as of recent origin, but many chemical facts were known to the ancients even before the Christian era.

Among the native timber used in New South Wales for coach-building and similar purposes, is the woolly but, the wood of which is employed for floors, shafts and spokes.

Some interesting experiments were lately made by M. Foellen, with the view of economizing fuel. The apparatus was composed of nine sheets of light woolly but and lignum vitae.

At breakfast next morning we had unbaked wheat porridge. Both of our guests declined them, but Mr. — looked very curiously to see what we should do with them.

"Oh, no, they're a lot of bread made of unbaked flour," he remarked. "I think it's very stupid to travel in a foreign country and shut all the doors."

"I don't know," returned Mr. — "The luggage shall come with me," he said, and he and his wife no more, but they had no more to say. They were both so English. They were both so English. They were both so English.
