CALCATRONES REVENGE.

Do you remember the incident that made so much talk four or five years ago, at the marriage of Antonin Leroux, the banker's son, with Mile, de la Combe-aux-Fontaines? Certainly ugly rumors ran at that time upon the solvability of this speculator, who had been partner with an Italian, the Count Calcatroni; the Italian occasionally visited the Leroux at that epoch, but he has since ceased to appear at the

On two or three occasions some charitable souls pretended that the marriage was broken off, but the ceremony took place, in spite of the oracles, The wedding gifts were numerous and splendid, and the envious persons asked themseives where that filabuster Leroux had taken all that, maliciously emphasizing the word.

Among the witnesses for the bride was the learned Desroches, librarian at friend of the Combe-aux-Fontaines. His functions of librarian imposed duties that seemed contradictory. He was obliged to be the most obliging of men, but also the most defiant. In each one of the readers who called upon him his role was to see a brother in science and almost a friend, but a friend whose fingers he must watch unceasingly, and whose pockets he must sound with an exercised regard.
