A Lesson on the Properties of Butter, and How to Make It-Wholesome Aphorisms to be Tacked on the Barn Door - Many Notes of Interest.

A Lesson in Butter Making.

We make butter from cream, we get cream from milk, and on the regetable and animal kingdoms are we dependent for the crude material, says a writer in the American Cultivaior. It has been found that by feedrich the quality of milk, make the oily pobules multiply without a relative expansion of water bulk, and that in a lesser way the caseine solids could be caused to likewise increase. Then again, experiments proved that peculiarities of vegetable flavor. nks the odor imparted to milk from roots, ensilinge, etc., could be averted by feeding such food to stock directly after milking. Gene- and milk-flavored herbage when surned to milk produce that aromatic and delicate butter favor, always -ought after by the consumer. While the composition of butter is sixty-cight parts paimitine and thirty parts oleine, there romains two parts which if affected debases the alue of the whole. This insignificant proportion of 2-100ths of the bulk maists of peculiar odoriferous and favoring ingredients, the principal of which has received the name of "butyrine." I caution the butter maker against using anything but the very best commercial color, because if has ingredients are used in eliminate ing the dys from the annutto seeds. the hue given to the dairy product will be of an interior cast.

It must be remembered that the butver globules or "oil drops" are not quite fluid, but have a pasty consistency, owing to the large amount of palmitine which they contain, in pro-portion to the olehos. These globules vary in size, but change shape alighty by heating, becoming more circuar in form. We know that a rupture of these globules means rancidity of the product, and cancil butter is fitted only for axia greasa. These globules taken in common compose the "grain," and the grain of butter should not be broken till it is spread by the table knifs of the consumer. The writer here presents the most sallent points of the new and intellileaginous commodity:
