

Senator Quay's Suits.

Last fall Senator Quay brought a libel suit against the Beaver Star, a newspaper in his own town, and the Pittsburg Post, for publishing that he had been identified with the Bardsley affair in Philadelphia.

The case was tried in the town of Beaver and in Pittsburg last week and the jury brought in a verdict for the Senator.

It appears that Bardsley and the Senator were in no way connected in business or political transactions, but that among the number of hands that a $9,000 note given by Quay for political campaign purposes passed through, were the hands of Bardsley, and of course, he, Bardsley, had to endorse it, just as every man has who has to do with paper that passes through a bank.

When the Philadelphia Keystone National Bank failed, and a search was made for papers, the name of Bardsley was found to have appeared on paper of Senator Quay. The men who found the paper knew there was nothing in it whatever to implicate Quay, further than what is found in the name of one or a dozen names that may be found on a business paper, on its passage through banking and business houses.

Bankable paper, frequently, on its passage from business house to business house, and from bank to bank, is endorsed by people who have no personal acquaintance with Senator Quay, and the name of Bardsley on the Senator's note was of no significance further than he was known and was in good financial standing at the time, at the bank.

The enemies of Senator Quay took hold of the matter to down Quay. They tried to have it appear that Quay was connected with the Bardsley steal. That was too much for the Senator. He had listened quietly to hundreds of charges against him, but when he was charged with complicity in the Bardsley stealings, it was too much for his good nature, hence the suit.

Now, a word about newspaper falsehoods. The Beaver Star and the Pittsburg Post are severely punished for the falsehoods they published, but the papers did not originate the falsehoods. They were furnished by Kerr, Chairman of the Democratic State Central Committee, and Senator Quay should now turn and present Kerr.

It is about time that newspapers discriminate more than has been their habit when documents are sent to them by committees for publication. A large percentage of the men who are clerks in and about political committees in nation, state and county, are political hummers and political suckers whose effusions are shaped to suit their own ends, and are unreliable, and instead of being fit subject for publication in a newspaper should be thrown into the waste basket. If the Star and Post had thrown committee man Kerr's production into the waste basket or into the stove they would have saved themselves the present humiliation.

Senator Quay's suit will prove itself a good thing for him and a good thing for the newspapers.
