The Grand Jury Fixer.

The grand jury fixer, through whom cases could be passed as true bills, or ignored, has been unearthed in Philadelphia, within the past ten days, and it looks as if some people about the Court House of the Quaker City are bound for a term of imprisonment, as they justly merit, for interfering with even handed justice.

The grand jury fixer confined his work to the jury fixer, possibly, because he could squeeze more money out of the cases to be acted on by that body.

The method that the grand jury fixer pursued, was not a difficult one, provided they could get up the right kind of a little ring about the Court House, and Sheriff's office to work with.

After the grand jury was drawn, they selected several names of men who give little or no attention to the progress of court affairs, these men were never notified that they had been drawn as jurors.

A number of other ring men who had not been drawn were called in and served as jurors, and they were the parties whose business it was to fix the cases according to the will and price of the parties in the jury fixing business.

The way the ring work was discovered was by the publication of the names of the men drawn as jurors. One or two of the jurors whose names appeared in the published list, but who had not been notified through the Sheriff's office, went to the court house and inquired about the drawing, and were there informed that they were not the parties who had been drawn, but other citizens of the same name.

The statement had a suspicious look and other parties took it up—notably the Times—and the result is, that a systematic system of grand jury fixing has been discovered, and the names of the false jurors were assumed for the time being to be those of the real jurors who had been drawn but not notified.

If the jury list had not been published, the iniquitous marriage of justice would still be going on. How long it is in practice in the Philadelphia courts is not known.

The Times exposure is of inestimable value to the public generally, for it checks corruption, fraud, deceit and injustice in the inner court, and all that is required to break up such court house villainy is to send the guilty party to prison.

Saved. An Alton girl was saved from the debating purposes of a drummer after she had been induced to go with him to Pittsburgh under the promise of marriage on the 10th inst.

A despatch from Pittsburgh under date of the 11th, inst., states the case thus:—Anton Mansell, claiming to be an agent of a Cincinnati brewery, came to Pittsburgh last night on the Pennsylvania Railroad, and with him was a woman of about 18.

The couple went to Cramer's Hotel, and as Mansell was registering "A. Mansell and wife," the girl exclaimed before the people that she was not his wife, and asked for protection.

The girl explained to Mr. Cramer that her home was in Altoona, where her mother kept a boarding house. Mansell had come to that city a few weeks ago and secured accommodations at her mother's house.

He told her that she could secure a position as book-keeper at a salary of $100 a month if she would come to Pittsburgh. She spoke to her mother, but she objected. Mansell then induced her to run away, which she did, landing here with him last night.

Mansell said he wanted to marry the girl, but she said she did not want him.

Completed his meal and escaped with in the forest.

Their Wedding Journey. From the Kansas City Times. It was on the train that came here late yesterday afternoon on the Maple Leaf road from Des Moines.

It is a story of newly wedded life, of buoyant young love, of hope, admiration and the pressing of fingers tips. The traveling pair got on the train at East Des Moines. She was out of breath because he had been misinformed as to the leaving time.

They had a great deal of baggage, and he walked down the aisle he was visibly annoyed by the creaking of his shoes and the persistent efforts of his grips and boxes to knock the heads off the passengers who were already seated.

"Oh, I'm nearly dead!" said she, panting with every step. "Are you really tired?" ask the man with a feeling that told the car how new he was.

"Tired? John! I'm just dead!" "Too bad! Can I do something for you? Can I get something for you?" "Nothing at all, thank you," said she with a strain at dignity that almost brought tears to her eyes.

They were seated soon, he insisting that there must be something that she wanted. There was no answer. She merely panted. For three minutes they were quiet. Then the train started and made a noise he leaned over and whispered: "Whose little girl?"

"Yours," she whispered. The traveler leaned out in the aisle to look, and she blushed and looked confused. He lowered her eyes. It was some time before another word passed. Then she spoke:

"I've been thinking, John, that we have got to begin economically." "Yes," almost whispered John, for that word "begin" told the car full of people that they were just married.

"You know that Mrs. Brown," she continued, "has gone to boarding, and she has some of the loveliest things to sell—nearly new. Don't you think that we ought to get them?" "Let me see, said John." "This is April—are these heating or cooking stoves, do—dear?"

"Heating, and such lovely base burners." "And next month is May—I'm a little afraid that it will be better to wait until fall." "But Mrs. Brown will sell them for less than—or go to housekeeping again."

"Don't you think that we could do better at the store?" "That isn't economy John," she said ruefully. "All right," said he, with resignation and a show of responsibility. "You go to the buying and I'll foot the bills."

There was a long pause. Then she seemed to realize that they were indeed married. "I didn't like you the day we met, did I?" she asked in a voice so loud that he cringed as he thought how everybody in the car was looking over her shoulder. The traveler bent his ear for the reply:

"But I liked you," he murmured. "Of course you'd say so," was the answer she made. His hand slipped over involuntarily and took hers.

"I'm mighty glad we met anyhow," said the bride fondly enough for the deaf man in the back seat to hear. He squirmed.

"What's the matter, dear? You're not sick?" "Oh, no, but speaking of economy, we can save half of our expenses and make a garden each summer." He almost whispered it.

"How lovely!" she exclaimed. "And I'll be your little gardener." He grinned so the Traveller heard him. "Do you know anything about celery?" was his next question, asked loudly and in a business like tone.

"Of course not. It is raised in a garden." "These I can go out and pull some nice new celery for your breakfast every morning. It'll taste better from my hands, won't it?"
