Commander Tyson wishes it understood that he is not in politics. When, however, he was asked his views on the senatorship, the brave old warrior promptly realied: "As a soldier I prefer Quay. Very few soldiers but would henor and do henor the brave among their number, and it requires a different kind of courage for a man who as been discharged from the army, on the field to volunteer his services when a battle in progress, than to perform all the duties in that battle that would devolve upon a part of the army. This Colonel Quay did do at the battle of Fredericksburg, when it is not too much to say that the large proportion of the army, after having served their term, would have taken advantage of the opportunity and escaped battle, particular-
