both a long and a brilliant one. Bob lived with a young lady named Nelly, on whom he showered all the love of his staunch true nature, and who returned his passion with affection scarcely less than his own.

The life these two spent together was that of peace and harmony, until one unlucky day a circus happened to pass through the town, and the latter deemed it her duty to be present at one of its performances. It was a black day for Bob: he often thought ruefully as he looked back on for from that time Nelly took strange and, in Bob's opinion, obj-c tional crazes into her head. She insisted upon his going through a daily series of gymnastic exercises, and purchased a box of ivory letters, from which he was expected to select partleular ones and deposit them in order on ue carpet. He didn't consider it at all an interesting game, and even used to become a triffe salien when evening after evening the same hateful box made its aprearance.
