Marsh Grimes with other hunters were in Licking Creek Valley the last days of the season for shooting deer. Two nice deer came along, Grimes popped at one, the game dropped, but it was down only a moment when it sprang to its feet and ran, it left a bloody trail to the land thicket where it was lost in the shade of night. Grimes believes he could have found the deer the next day but the lawful time for shooting expired that morning and he believed that if he had been found coming out of the valley that day with a deer some one would have given him trouble by bringing a suit against him for shooting deer out of season.
