I may add Charles Gounod's elevation of style in his sacred works results from the intense serious studies be pursued at the commencement of his career, and his minor works he has composed are varied and full of requantitatively, and not by any means the train. This work met with unbounded success. he set to music the words of the Ave Maris, for soprano voice; it was performed at Baden-Baden, Mme. Miolan Carvaiho being the vocalist, Vieuxtemps performing on the violin, grand old Thalbergon the planoforte, and Berlioz conducted the cherus, four harps accompanying. It was a gigantic success. Another admirable work is his song entitled "La Serenade" with Harmonium accompaniment. This song has been hackneyed to death all over the world from the time Gounod gained his prix de Rome. For over five years, (between the years 1844 and 1849), none of his friends or acquaintances knew where he was or what he did. The busy bodies of the public, of course, circulated "sweet pleasant fairy takes" accounting for his disap-pearence which did not do much barm. In a certain coterie a pretty (very) and romantic explanation full of interest has been gently wafted about. I will not relate it because I am not quite sure it has any true foundation, and I question the delicity of the act should any brother or sister artist divulge it and make this private affair an open secret, between friends and brothers, absit invidid.
