some wonderful possibilities for woman, and the question, "Is there a conflict be tween woman's duty to her home and her participation in public life?" is exceedingly pertinent at this juncture. It seems scarcely necessary to repeat the well worn truth that home is the keystone of society's arch. The people of the United States have long pointed to their homes as an evidence of the stability of their government. The recent census exhibits a large increase of householders over the previous census, and as this prosperous condition of affairs has grown side by side with the rapid advancement of women to positions of trust and A wan has broken out between brother's clothes, and from that time were dying.
