to shake the earth to its very center. Gibraltar has been besieged no less than thirteen times. Its possession rested alternately with the Moors and the Spaniards until 1704, when it was attacked during the war of the Spanish succession by the English and Dutch fleets and surrendered after a short resistance. The Spaniards, during the sine years following, vainly endeavored to recover it, but in 1713 its possession was secured to the English by the peace of Utrecht. The last and most memorable siege was in 1779, when Gen. George Elliott and his gallant band of 6,000 half-starved men successfully held the place for four years against the combined feets of Spain and France. That was a close shave for the English, but they have provided against a recurrence in such a manner that it seems certain that nothing short of an earthquake will ever dislodge them from the rock.
