This light money got to be such a nuisance that the sovereign feouncil met and abolished the overvaluation in the hope of checking its inflow. Traffic with the English and Dutch colonies to the south was prohibited, nevertheless the English and Dutch traders carried it on surreptitiously, and found it more profitable to pay for French beaver skins in light reals and plastres than in honest goods. Commerce within the colony was greatly hampered by the uncertainty of the value of this light foreign money. It was not legal ender, one was not obliged to take it, and in 1683 the Quebec merchants refused to accept it at any figure, whereupon the To effect this it was necessary to weigh drawn on the French treasury and so long as the bills were promptly paid. When, however, owing to reckless financing and the drain of war, France could no longer take up the bills, the Canadian holders of cards were nearly beggared. Toward the end of the French regime the intendant was allowed to issue a paper money known as ordonnances as he saw fit. The ordonnances were not convertible into anything except as circumstances permitted, and circulated at a heavy disount from the start. When England took session the card money and ordonnances held in the colony amounted, face value, to no less than 41,000,000 francs, or about $10,000,000 for 65,000 people. Here was a "cheap and abundant currency" with a vengeance. The bank note circulation in Canada today, for a population of 5,000,000, is about $30,000,000. But it is demonstrable that New France lost more by that "cheap" money experience than by the ravages of the British troops in the parishes and the bombardment of the city
