

CHAPTER VIII.—(Continued.)

Before her mother could say one word in opposition, the little person had slipped behind Armathwaite with the most comical uplook of mischief into his face, and...

"I can give it to you now, Dr. Pele. It is with my heartiest thanks—yes."

"Well, you have still, until I tell you the secrets I spoke of, the power to retract. In the meantime will you go downstairs and have tea with your new sister?"

"I have no patience," she began, "with people who think, simply because they have lived in a particular spot of the earth, that they ought to be bowed down by the inhabitants of every other spot."

"Then you like Alma Cromont best?" said Miss Pele. "In so glad. It's a good sign in a man to do that, I feel sure."

"I have been here by the strangest accident," answered Armathwaite. "Or rather by an incident which has already led to so many more interruptions."
