impelled by an uncontrollable impulse remarked—
"Rex is rather an uncommon name, is it not?"

"It means 'king' in Latin," said the boy. "I have got past these names in the third declension. My mamma says that a boy by that name ought always to be master of himself."

"And how about a man by that name?" said Rex, hardly able to control his voice—he stole a look at the pale face on the pillow beside him, and saw the gray eyes were full of tears.

"I am trying," she said, to instil into my little boy's mind the greatest of all knowledge—the necessity of being stronger than his passions. I was obliged to learn my lesson from my own experience. I pray God he may be spared that."

"Now show me how to put in my other name," put in the Major, "and I'll get another stick, and see if I can do it all. I can make a better X than that I know before I try."

"In a moment," said Rex. His voice sounded far off, and a sudden glimmer of the truth made him faint and dizzy. "Where is your father, Rex?" he continued, gathering boldness from the strange conflict of his emotions.

"Dead, perhaps, grandpa says. I never saw my father. Isn't it funny, doctor?"

"Never say that again, Rex, never again as long as you live," said the invalid, with sudden fire. "Your father is not dead; I know, and your grandpa doesn't. I beg your pardon, doctor," she continued, softening down; "but why did we get on this subject—why did we?"

I was growing so calm, so peaceful, and now—Oh, you're a physician and have seen sorrow. Tell me, did you ever know anything like this?" as she loosened her coil, and let down a yard of snow white hair. "It took six months of anguish only to change all this brown into snowy white."

"And you loved your husband so much?" Rex asked, his eyes moistened with tears.

"When I found he was gone, I realized what I had lost, and my heart and my conscience have taken turns in lashing me ever since."

"Major," said Rex, with a sudden strength "let me guess your last name. It is Haughton—Rex Haughton, and your mother's name is Blanche, and your father's name is Rex—Rex Haughton—and he has been a fool and a villain, and a low contemptible scoundrel—"

"Sir!" interrupted the little lady fiercely.

"And to think that we should not have known each other," he went on. In a moment more the little Rex was in his father's arms, and kissed over and over again, and by the time the wife's turn came, she understood it all. She did not faint nor weep, she would her arms about her husband's neck; and prayed the sweetest prayer that ever fell from mortal lips; and Rex knew how patience had done her perfect work, and he prayed that he might be worthy of her.

Joe stepped into the porch in the midst of the scene, and then, with his hand over his mouth, to prevent an explosion, made for the nearest woods. Once there his disappointment had full away. He capered like a monkey, and roared like a bear, and when late in the afternoon Rex found him, it was a long time before he could be made to listen to an explanation. When he did understand, his only reply was:

"Well that alters the case," and immediately went home and got supper. Joe spends his winters with the Haughtons, and this very month they are once more in the log hut in the Adirondacks.

Farm and Household.

To Prepare Cabbage for the Table.

Cabbage is an excellent dish when properly prepared, but as we see it brought to the table sometimes it reminds us that there are several ways of doing a thing and the easiest is not always the best. Now instead of cutting the cabbage head in quarters and throwing it in with a great piece of fat meat, just take out the heart from each piece and drop them into a kettle of cold water with a handful of salt. Let it boil slowly until tender, and drain off all the water; add a piece of butter, a spoonful of sweet cream and some pepper; stir it up well and serve hot. For hot stew cut the cabbage fine either with a knife on the table, or put it in the chopping bowl, get it in small pieces some way, then cook until tender in just enough water to keep it from burning. When tender, add a spoonful or two of fried meat fat or butter if preferred, the same of thick cream, vinegar to suit the taste, and pepper and salt the same. Don't have it so juicy that it will spoil everything else on your plate. Cold slaw should be chopped as fine as mince-meat, and while chopping add a little salt and pepper. Put it into a deep dish, and pour on good strong vinegar sweetened as for lettuce. Dish it out in deep sauce plates. This is excellent with oyster soup.

The Value of stable Manure.—In 1872 the manure made by 725 horses belonging to the Philadelphia street car stables was sold at public sale at from $12 to $16 per horse. Some lots sold at $15 per horse at private sale. The average amount produced by a horse per year was five tons. A ton of the manure as delivered from the stables measure about seventy-six cubic feet.

Will Fancy Poultry Pay.

We often read that pure-blooded fowls will "shell out" best, but such has not been my experience.

I find that hens with a standing comb which fanciers call a top-comb, or one with legs not colored as the books demand or one slightly faulty in some other direction will provokingly lay just as many as the perfect beauties. Of course this should not be so, but such is the case.

In fact I have been the most successful by crossing the different breeds. A flock of fowls looking like "two peas in a pod" are a beautiful sight to behold, but, there the great advantage ends. It is perfectly legitimate for a person with strong tastes for looks to gratify that taste by the perfect uniformity of his fowls, or in any other direction; but this may be carried beyond the point of profit.

The old lady who white-washed her coal was very likely a pattern of neatness and taste, but she evidently carried her hobby to excess.

In poultry-keeping the person who cares only for looks, will frame a different management from one who cares only for profit, or from one who desires to combine these two desirable ends.

One can easily see that persons selling eggs at high prices for "batching," are the greatest gainers by this "keeping up to the standard of excellence," as it is called.

Should people learn to be less particular about appearances, then "Othello's occupation would be gone," or at least greatly interferred with and then we should hear less complaint about "fancy eggs" hatching.

I desire to cast no reflections upon honest "men fanciers," for such there are—but at the same time there are some who are evidently dishonest, and many more who are so careless in shipping eggs that it almost amounts to dishonesty, to the buyer at least.

My own experience in paying two to four dollars per dozen for eggs has proved very unsatisfactory. Many others are constantly making the same complaint.

Honest dealers will not object to these remarks, for it is the "galled jade" that will "wince." Persons who are at great expense in importing and breeding fancy fowls, should of course be well paid, and it would be very unreasonable to object to this; but they have counterfeit followers who should be avoided as far as possible.

I know of several instances where some of this latter class have picked up some very fine-looking fowls—not well bred—and palmed them off for pure bloods.

I recall one instance where two fanciers traded cocks and then reported that they had paid $100 for them. That is, O had bought a cock for $100 of H, and had paid him with another at the same price. This practice is not so very uncommon either.

A person purchased one dozen Dorking eggs and succeeded in hatching out two Black Spanish chickens; the balance of the eggs refused to yield anything.

Buy only of those you have reason to believe will deal honestly and remember that the hens you now have will with proper care probably prove as profitable as will any of the (to you) new breeds.

English Hedge Rows.

A letter in the Gardener's Record says: "In this district the fields have been planted with rows and double rows of trees, and fields can be seen completely surrounded with huge old trees, which are a pleasing object to the eye, but are injurious to the crops and soil within the influence of their tops and roots. All honor is due to the worthy generation of planters who planted, that future generations might enjoy and benefit by their improvements; and we must candidly admit they were far in advance of us of the nineteenth century. Yet it was an error to surround their fields with trees. In the first place, the roots impoverish the soil as far as they travel into the fields and prevent the plow from being able to do its work; and again the shade of the trees generally draws the crops' sown underneath or near them. Allow me to give the following simple instructions for planting groups, which, as well as improving the entire appearance of the country, could it be carried out on a scale of usefulness even on the smallest farm. First plant the angles only of your fields, say five to ten pines at the corners, according to size and taste; and it will be seen that shelter will be secured from three sides without any trouble on our part; then we have only to secure and fence the base on one side of the angle next to the field. There are many positions in which four fields are connected at the corners and it will be seen that in planting, as I recommend great shelter will thus be afforded, as the four corners of the fields thus planted will form a pretty circular clump or grove of four different shades of foliage, if so desired. Although the form of the grove is diamond in shape, all such clumps appear circular when seen from a distance; and, when the trees are twenty years planted, the inner fences could be levelled, in order to allow cattle to enter for shelter from the burning rays of the summer sun. The foregoing simple plan of planting could be easily carried out, and with very great advantage.

Carelessness or neglect in selecting seeds occasions great losses every year. Above all things avoid foul seed. A man who will recklessly seed his ground to weeds is unworthy of the honored name of a farmer.
