The workingmen held a public meeting in Carbondale, in City Hall, Wednesday evening. The occasion proved to be an interesting one. The chairman called the meeting to order, after which A. E. Kline was duly introduced who dwelt to some length on the oppression of all working classes; and in view of these facts, drew conclusions on the wickedness of men being professedly a free and religious people, to allow themselves to be reduced to such a low condition when it can be legally avoided.

Scranton has the last thing out in mothers-in law: She had succeeded in marrying her son and naturally undertook the management of his household. Presently the son died, but she continued to advise, direct and worry generally. her daughter-in-law. Then the daughter-in-law married again, but still the old lady insisted on bossing things. A friend essayed to convince her that she could have no possible right to intefere—that the new husband was nothing to her.-"Nothing?" she cried, "he nothing to me?" Why, am I not his stepmotherin-law on his wife's side?"
