

Getting into a Tight Place. During the brush between Uncle Sam and the Britishers, a regiment was sent in Canada, called the King's Own. It was more properly nicknamed the Devil's Own, its advent in a place being more dreaded than an invasion in a kingdom. The officers kept up a Satanic form of their corps with commendable spirit, the 'pillar' being English D.P. He was the most consummate practical joker in the army, and his mischievous humor led him in consequence of the repeated success of tricks upon them. After an outrageous affair, which nearly cost the lives of two or three of his comrades, it was resolved to retaliate at the earliest opportunity, which soon offered. The regiment, on the march to the frontier, bivouacked in the vicinity of L'Acadia. It then became a question of some import to know how the mess-table was to be furnished. One suggested a very common expedient among both officers and men, viz., a visit to some neighboring hen coop. Another immediately added that, at about a mile from the bivouac, he had noticed an old lady feeding some pretty plump geese.

Who'll crawl in? came to be the question. "D.E." he understands the business, and is the smallest chap among us," said one of the party. "Certainly," cried the Ensign, who always sought distinction in exploits of the kind, "I will, but some of you must go to the house and entertain the old woman so she may not interrupt my operations." D.E., although a slight man, had to exert his utmost strength in order to squeeze himself half through the little door of the pen. "Now," he cried, warding off the attack of a belching old goose; "run in to the house."

Madam! Madam! they cried—there's a fellow stealing your geese! Come quick—quick! The old lady flew to the chimney-corner, seized her broom-stick, and sallied out to surprise the Ensign in the hottest of his tussle with his ferocious antagonist, the patriarchal goose. She instantly proceeded to intimate her presence by dealing the trespasser a terrific blow, the full force of which fell upon the exposed part with unexpected effect, as he had on his shell-jacket only. "Hello, there! Stop that, you fool—you hurt!" shouted the officer. "I ah, you rascal," the unfortunate woman shrieked. "I'll teach you to rob a poor lone-widder of her lawful property," and she applied her weapon to the culprit with redoubled energy. "Murder!" yelled the Ensign. "That's it," whispered a captain who owned D.E., a grudge of long standing. "Give it to the fellow," he added, snatching the broom-stick from the shoulder. "Whack—whack!" went the broom-stick. "Ough—murder! Murder—murder!" yelled the depredator. "Strike lower, my good woman, with the vindictive broom, with as much coolness as if he was superintending a military flugging. The injunction was implicitly followed. D.E. roared with pain, and made superannuated efforts to extricate himself. His comrades, all but the inexorable captain, were rolling upon the grass, convulsed with laughter. "I'll give you a guinea if you'll stop," cried the Ensign. "I'll give you two—go!" whispered the captain, urging her on. She resumed the castigation with a blow that sent the broomstick flying to pieces. D.E. grew desperate, and with the yell of a Mohawk he escaped—a goose in each hand. He heaved alone upon the booty that night, but the others were too much delighted to complain of a slimness in consequence—Cottage Gas.

A SAD CONTRAST.—A painter once met with a beautiful child. So enraptured was he with its countenance and expression of loveliness, that he resolved to paint it. He made it his guardian angel. In sorrow and passion he sought relief and tranquillity in gazing upon that charming countenance. He supposed, if he ever saw its countenance, to paint that also. But years passed away before he found a face so intensely ugly as to satisfy his idea of a perfect contrast to his darling picture. It was that of a wretch lying in despair upon the floor of his cell. He painted that terrible countenance. But what must have been his emotions when he learned that it was the very same person that he had painted before? The first was the face of the innocent child; the last that of the reckless, ruined youth. The best things portrayed become the worst. The sweet juices changed, produce the bitter acids.—That little angel-likeness had become metamorphosed into the reality of a fiend.

The Responsibility. A young man in Virginia had become temperate. He was a man of great capacity, fascination and power, but he had a passion for brandy, which nothing could control. Often in his walks a friend would remonstrate with him in vain; and as often he would urge his friend to take only a social glass, but always in vain. On one occasion, the latter agreed to yield to him, and as they went up to the bar together, the latter said to the friend: "Now, I will have a glass of wine." The glasses were filled, and the two friends stood ready to pledge each other in renewed and eternal friendship, when he paused and said to his temperate friend: "Now I will have a glass of brandy." The two friends walked away without saying a word. Ah, the drinker knows the consequence of a first glass. Even in the few minutes of liquor, he is not willing to assume the responsibility of another, becoming a drunkard.
