The Farm and the Fireside.

To Destroy Underbrush.

"What is the best time to cut underbrush, &c.?" In the June number of the Farmer the above question is proposed by "A Subscriber," to which I propose to give an answer, combining both a little experience and a little theory. Having been brought up on a farm, I used to hear much said by farmers in regard to the "best time" for cutting bushes, &c., and remember well the many uncertainties that existed, and the various opinions given on the subject. Some recommended to cut them at one season, some at another. Some regard the "moon," others the "signs," &c. I also remember that the same kind of underbrush, if cut at one season, would start again and grow luxuriantly; but, if cut at another, would be completely "used up." I have also within the last few years had oportunity to notice the same facts; and the conclusion to which I have arrived is, that different shrubs or bushes, trees, &c., may be cut at different seasons of the year. Some are killed by cutting as early as the first of July, others by the first of August: and so on till October or even November. The rule is this: "Cut any plant, or shrub, about the time that it has done growing for the season, and its destruction is almost certain." If cut before this time, it will generally start again the next year. The exceptions are few. So much for the facts now for the theory.

1st. In the spring of the year all roots are vigorous. Hence, if a tree or shrub be cut at this time, or while in full growth the roots will send forth a new set of shoots. The exceptions are—1st. Evergreens, as pine, hemlock, spruce, &c. 2d. Those that have a copious flow of sap in the spring, as the maple, birch, &c. Yet even some of these will start again if cut soon after the buds have opend, i. e., after the spring flow of sap has ceased; except in the case of old or large trees, in which the roots appear not sufficiently vigorous, or the evaporation from the new stump too rapid, to allow of the formation of new shoots.

2d In autumn, when a shrub or tree has done growing for the season, the active energies of the roots cease, being, perhaps, somewhat exhausted by its summer action. If then the bush or tree be cut after it has done growing, but while the stem and leaves are fresh and full of sap, the vital force of the roots will rarely be sufficient to cause a new growth; but if left till the foliage is dead or dying, the energies of the roots are restored by the returning of the sap, and are ready for action again as soon as the season of growth shall return. Hence, too early or too late cutting will be equally unsuccessful.

Cut your underbrush, then, at the time above specified, and it will rarely start again. If it does, the growth will apear stinted or sickly, and soon die of its own accord, or a second cutting at the proper time will insure success. The same rule applies to all other plants, as the Canada thistle, milk-weed, &c. &c., with greater or less certainty, according to the greater or less vital force, or tenacity of life peculiar to the roots of each kind of vegetable.

The "proper time" can easily be determined by observing whether new leaves continue to appear at the end of the prominent branches. When the end leaves are of full size, and a bud is seen at the end of the branch, then (or soon after) is your time to cut. If deferred long beyond this time, or till the leaves begin to turn yellow, or fall, cutting will be of little use, as the roots will be "strong" for a new start on the opening of a new spring.—Genesee Farmer.

Food for Crops.

This is a "grand question" among farmers at the present day. In new countries, where the land has not been cultivated much, little is thought about giving the crop any food, in order to make it food for ourselves, but after the best soil has been exhausted by constant cropping—after the "new" is off or rather out, the farmer finds, that to make food for himself, he must give food to the plants he wishes to raise.

Well what must it be? To answer it with perfect accuracy, you should first know what the soil is made of—or, in other words, both should be analysed, and the ingredients ascertained, both as to their quality and quantity. But this requires a greater knowledge of practical chemistry than the majority of the people as yet possess, and also more expense than most farmers are able to meet.

What is the next best thing to be done? fortunately the remains of organic bodies, (by which we mean those bodies both of animal and vegetable origin, that have had life and a set of organs forming their bodies) possess most of the ingredients required for this purpose. Although some of the ingredients which make up the mass of organic matters may not be needed in this crop, they will not be lost and will come in play for some future one.

We are aware that there is much said about specific manner, and this article and that article is loudly recommended as the very thing and the only thing needed. We do not undervalue them, at the same time we caution our readers not to overvalue them.—Watch all experiments—use every of the specific kind, such as plaster superphosphate of lime, sulphat of ammonia guano, &c., &c., as you know will be beneficial, but at the same time don't give up your manure heap.

As a general rule, the remains or manure made from the remains, of organic bodies the nearest related, that is the nearest in kind and quality to those which you wish to raise, will make the best manure for them.—Return to the soil again as much of the crop as you can, in order to make another one.

Nature gives you this advice. How is it that yonder forest has kept up for so many years such a heavy crop of wood? How is it, that for as long as you can remember, there has not only been a heavy burthen of wood on that soil, but it has been constantly increased in growth? It is manured every fall as sure as the fall comes, by a thick deposit of leaves, and twigs, and small branches, which the frosts, and the winds, and snow break off and spread around their roots.—These leaves and twigs are made up out of material, in part drawn from the air, and of the same kind as the rest of the wood, and so they decay and supply food for the standing growing wood.

The vine growers in some parts of France, find the clippings and prunings of their vines to be a valuable dressing for their vineyards. The cotton growers of the south begin to find that the cotton seeds and refuse cotton is a valuable dressing for cotton plants.

Many of our farmers begin to find that the stalks and husks of Indian corn, plowed under, makes a valuable manure for the corn crop, and that the prunings of the orchard, chipped up and applied to the trees from which they were taken, make a valuable dressing for the orchard.—Maine Farmer.
