A Good Story and A Good Speech. In a speech of about three hours long, delivered at Saratoga, Daniel Webster told the following illustrative anecdote:

Seth Peterson was a neighbor of Mr. W., a hardy Yankee, of amphibious habits, half farmer, half fisherman, with plenty of the "poor man's blessings," and a good share of the comhe and Mr. W. were alone in a little boat, 1eat the oars, he would sometimes give his own conceptions of national policy. He had heard of the new notion among political men, that low prices were as good for poor men as high, provided the necessaries of life were reduced in a proportionate degree; and was asked what he thought of these changes.

He said --- "If every thing which the poor man wants could be reduced in exact propertion to the reduction of his wages, and remain so, he would not suffer by the change. But I have only one thing to sell, and that is my labor. I have many things to buy, and I find the reduction does not reach all the articles which want. Flour and meat may be reduced, but tea, coffee, sugar, spices, and many other articles, are just the same as they were before the reduction of the wages of labor. My interest, therefore, induces me to be in favor of a high rate of wages." This, said Mr. Webster, is practical wisdom, which is far better than the theories of politicians. The reasoning of the best posssible form.

A correspondent of the New York American, referring to the same speech says:

"I agree," said Mr. Webster, "that to live in a log cabin is no recommendation of a candidate for the presidency; neither is it any disqualifiman who, by his capacity and industry has raised himself from a log cabin, to eminent stations in his country, is of more than ordinary frontier of New Hampshire, when beyond the case." smoke which curled from its chimney, not another stood between it and the walls of Quebec.

I do not pretend to give the exact words but this was the general sentiment, and the pause that followed-the choking pause of thousands advantages of low wages and dry of hearts struggling to subdue the emotions bread, would change their note if they does not take place, then, the blood is made the which this simple burst of filial piety called up, bore Nature's holiest testimony to the power and elequence of unadorned and unexaggerated Truth.
