To show the difference between Raw Corn and Corn Meal cooked, as food for Hogs. - Some two firm. years ago, while I was confined to the firesides by a cold, I amused myself with several experiments to find the increase by weight of corn, rye, shorts, &c. by boiling and cooking, with a wiew to economisting hog food, I soon became convinced that wonderful effects might be easily produced; and though I then made a regular secord of what I did, strange to tell, I have never till lately attempted to put my theory in practice. I have had since the first of December an actual experiment going on between raw corn and meal made into good thick mush-two pigs of about one hundred weight each, have been January 20th, 1841. eating seven lbs. each of raw corn per twenty four hours; and two others of near the same size, have had exactly seven lbs. of meal made into good mush between them. This seven pounds of meal cooked into a state of good stiff mush, weighs from twenty-eight to thirty-three pounds. I weighed my pigs accurately at beginning, and weighed again two days since to mark the progress. The two eating fourteen pounds of corn per day, had increased seventeen pounds in sixteen days .- The two eating seven pounds of cooked meal per day, had increased twenty-four half the corn. I shall carry them on till the will be paid, by first of January, when I shall kill them .- Am.
