Bread from Wood.

Some twenty or more years ago, Braconnot, French chemist, discovered that sawdust, by food; and about the same time, Autenrilih, will be disposed of according to law. German savant, taking the hint, perhaps, from Franklin's experiment of the sawdust pie, nade the still more important discovery that e same substance could, by even a cheaper nd simpler process, (consisting essentially of washing, baking and grinding,) be converted nio bread, -- or into a kind of flour or meal, rom which very good and nutritious porridge ould be made, and bread " sufficiently good to eaten." The discovery was hailed, at the ine, by philosophers, as one of incalculable enefit to mankind; and Herschel, in his " Preminary Discourse," boldly characterized it as e "which rendered famine next to impossi

This assurance, in the nature of a prediction, nunded upon what was alleged to be an ascerained fact, rises upon the memory with the nore force at the close of an actual famine which has so lately desolated Ireland; and one annot help asking how the protection of the German discovery came to fail, or to be negected,-or perhaps entirely forgotten,--amid Il the horrors of a scarcity in which many perons died from starvation. If eatable and numious bread was made from woody fibre in 826, it could have been also made in 1846; and where wood was wanting to supply the raw naterial, it could have been furnished in abuncance from the turf-bogs of Ireland--for the woody fibre of turf is chemically identical with hat of wood, and can, doubtless, be as readily onverted into gum, or sugar or bread.

We revive this subject for the purpose of soneming to it again the attention of scientific nen, who are now better than ever before prepared to perfect, and apply to the wants of life, ny really valuable discovery. Autenrilth's act is either a true or a false one; and bread an, or cannot, be made from wood. If false, he chimera should be exploded; if true, the act ought to be absolutely ascertained and auhenticated, and the discovery rendered appliable to useful purposes. All things that are ossible, are possible to science; and the forst and the bog, -the straw on which the corn has failed to appear, and the hay consumed by nimals,...nay even the gorse and the heather, he thistle and the brier, and the thousand parse shrubs and weeds rejected by man and east, may be found to contain within themelves secret magazines of food, laid up in store Providence to feed the teeming multitudes the coming ages, in periods of dearth, and be opened only when that intellect which was given us to unlock the secrets of nature, as been devoted to their careful exploration.
