The Fishing Telescope.

Every Norwegian fishing boat is furnished with what is termed a Water Telescope, and which is considered almost as indispensable as the boat itself. This Telescope consists of a tube three or four feet long, containing the proper glasses, and made water tight. When the fishing ground is reached they immerse one end of this telescope in the water, and look through the glass, which shows objects some ten or fifteen fathoms deep as distinctly as if they were within a foot of the surface, by which means, when a shoal of fish comes with their glasses, and where they find the fish swarming about in great numbers, then they give the signal, and surround the fish with their large draught net, and often catch them in hundreds at a haul. Without these telescopes their business would often prove precarious and unprofitable, as the fish, by these glasses, are as distinctly seen in the deep, clear sea of Norway, as gold fish in a chrystal jar. This instrument has been lately adopted by the Scotch fishermen on the Tay, and cover stones, holes, and uneven ground, over which their nets travel, and have found the telescope answer to admiration—the minutest object in twelve feet water being as clearly seen as on the surface.

The Lion's Share.

The old saying of the Lion's share, meaning the better part of anything, or all that is valuable of it, is founded upon the following fable of Phædrus, or Æsop, we forget which :

"A leopard, a lynx, and a wolf were ambitious of the honor of hunting with the lion. His savage majesty graciously condescended to their desire, and it was agreed that they should all have an equal share in whatever might be taken. They cour the forest, are unanimous in the pursuit, and into four equal parts; but as each was going to secure his share 'Hold!' said the lion; 'let no ne presume to serve himself till he hath heard our just and reasonable claims; I seize upon the the terror of his paws, they silently withdrew, resolving never to hunt again but with their equals." This fable teaches a good moral. There are any lions in the community like the above, but alization of power among the masses leaves em nothing but the disposition to grasp everyig; the ability to do it having been taken from
