Next in order is the fitting of the shoe. As there are not many hand-made shoes used now we will begin with the dressing of the shoe, which in my opinion begins with welding on the toe calk, the length of which shoe and never more than five-should be in proportion to the size of the shoe and never more than five-seights of an inch high, set on the shoe and not beside it. The toe calk back from the edge of the shoe as it relieves the strain on the tendons of raising over the extreme point of the foot. Toe clips are an advantage to travelling horses and sulfary to the hoof as is sometimes thought. Shoes should be swedged so that the nail holes on the foot surface would be from one-fourth to three-eights of an inch in from the edge of the shoe, according to the heft of the hoof, as their swedging splits off the hoof. Nail holes should be punched with a small tapered punch which packs the iron around the hole and gives the nail a large blunt better the pair and the store of the shoe and gives the nail a large blunt better the pair the store of the shoe and possible transport to the social parts have taken by the store of G. horse will not travel easy shod in this way. Raising the shoe off the heels is good in some cases, but I prefer & bare shoe in such cases. The shoe should not be burned into the foot as it injures it very much, although with the shoe a little warm the feet can be better leveled. Next comes the driving. This I commence by driving the second nail from the toe on the right hand side, the nail opposite next; then nail to best advantage, as a shoe can be shifted by driving a nail. The nails should be dressed so as to drive straight from the bottom of the nail hole in the shoe to the surface of the wall, one inch above the shoe, or bet-ter less than more. Nails should not be drove in a curve, as the nails act as a lever when the clinch is drawn to prize off pieces of the hoof. Nails should be driven slowly, not as if the smiths whole aim in life was to send it home at two or three strikes. As a nail may be set wrong by the best of shoers, it would not so much harm under a light stroke, where it might ruin a horse under a heavy blow. It is seldom that too light a nail is used; a nails width at the clinch should be three times its thickness and thicker but not wider at the neck. As to the head of a nail it is owing to the swedging and the holes in the shoe as to its size and shape. The rasp should be run lightly under the clinch before drawing the nails. There is about as much in settling the nails light in the shoe as in drawing the clinch tight. Now comes the finishing touch

The rasp should not be used too much under the clinch, and the missing of the nail and cutting the hoof with the hammer is equally bad. Of course if the shoe is properly set on the wall o the foot, there will not be much hoo to file away, and the less the better The clinches should be rasped off level with the hoof, never rasp the foot above the clinches, then if there was some castile soap rubbed over the foot to keep out the wet and air the job might be called finished. Providing you don't get a roast.
