CROWDS

It is cheaper and far less difficult to procure cross-bred fowls than pure-breds. The first can be bought on every hand and at market rates, while fowls that will come up to the "standard" cost fancy prices, having princi-pally their good looks to recommend them. High priced eggs are usually difficult to hatch, two or three chickens per dozen eggs being the average. I have been through the fancy chicken craze, and have, I think, gained wisdom. My object in keeping hens is to make money, and to do this I must have eggs in winter. My plan is as I keep the hens in a warm place, and reep the nens in a warm place, and feed a variety of food, but depend principally on wheat. I provide plenty of water, broken oyster shells, fresh meat, carrots, &c. They commence to set about the first of April, and I set all the here receible up to the middle of the hens possible up to the middle of May. When the the chickens come off I give two or three clutches to one hen and as soon as the chickens are able to take care of themselves, I sell off the old hens, reserving only as many as will supply the family with eggs. As soon as the cockerels will weigh two to three pounds, I sell them off. keeping the pullets, or as many as is desirable, for the next winter layers. These, if well fed, will lay a few eggs in November, quite freely during December, and by the first of January they will be in full production.

This has been my plan of operations for the last fourteen years, and it has proved profitable. In looking over my books for the past four years, I discover that taking the number of hens on hand January 1st of each year, they have given me an average of nine dozen eggs each per year. While I have not reached the 12½ dozen eggs mennot reached the 12½ dozen eggs mentioned, still, I have made nearly as much on chickens as on eggs, and have saved the cost of keeping the hens for the several months when eggs were low. I usually buy cocks each season to put with my hens, preferring some of the large breeds in order to raise heavier chickens to sell.
