The old town is very strange and amusing to visit, they have some very nice gardens and choice fruits, some very large vineyards and peach orchards around the town. What is strange about the old town is it appearance, you will see a sign hanging over a door, and from the streets you might take the house for a large cow stable daubed with mud (for mud) mends every house and raw hide every wagon and fence both among the In dians and Mexicans) but enter and you Egggs will find as much goods for sale, and of as good a quality as you will find in any store in Butler or Pittsburgh. The new town has some very handsome stores both inside and outside. These new stores are built two stories high, the walls of adobe, the fronts, some them, iron and tin roofing. The Mex-icans are a very slow people, they do everything as it was done a thousand rears ago, they tread out the grain with horses, oxen, donkeys and sometimes sheep; then they toss it up with orks in the wind, and so separate the chaff from the grain The women grind the corn in little mills, but of ate a number of grist mills have been erected around Albuquerque and now the men complain, saying that their women are very lazy, and make them go to the mill with the grain. Both he old and new towns are on the east bank of the Rio Grande, the western banks seems to be nothing but sand rocks. The valley on the east side is about twenty miles in width and I have no idea how long. It seems to be nothing but sand, yet they raise as fine fields of corn as I have ever seen; this is done by irrigation.
