A Kittanning mother writes to the Times of that venerable old borough to complain of the system of education in the public schools, as applied to her two children—a son, aged nine, and a daughter, aged eleven years.

She finds her children's minds wholly unimpaired by the learning "Mary had a Little Lamb," and the "Boy Stood on the Burning Deck," which they can repeat with an aptness that surprises her.

To this she added the wonderful doggerel of Mother Goose, which they know by heart, while they "are unable to correctly spell words of three or four syllables or read a page of pieces from their readers and spellers."

She calls the attention of the School Board to the facts as stated, and hopes for relief.
