A careful reading of the above dis-closes the old free trade principle. But what if the amount of duty laid does raise the price to consumers? Is it not better it should be so than to be dependant upon and buy from foreign countries? Protection to home industries gives employment to be main dustries gives employment is a three-loot vein, and still higher up is a four-foot vein, which the farmers call black coal. Then would we not pay to the foreign manufacturer what we now pay to our own? And there would be no competition, "the life of trade." And there would be no place for home labor, and hence no home market. It would be a strange country that does not protect its own industries, as strange as a man who did not protect his own man who did not protect his own business. The whole argument of the President is against this prin-ciple, and, bringing it up in the manner he has, it will soon be acted spon by the people at the polls, and will be decided against him. We will give his message in full in our next. That is not deprive persons of their court answers that according to reas-on and common senso.
