SEPT. 20ти, 1889. EGYPT: Those who were fortunate nough to attend the theatre last evening were no doubt surprised at the deep and absorbing interest entering in Laura Don's play as brought by Effie Ellsler and her excellent company. Those who have admired Effie Ellsler in serious roles, should by all means see her in "Egypt." It is a evelation, showing how broad and com prehensive is her art. She makes of this girlish part a delightful picture, full of the girlish part a delightful picture, full of the charm of simplicity, a charm that has no equal by the way.

The play is a remarkable creation in a way. It introduces a dream that is probably more original, and affording a wider scope to the actress than any known to the stage. Its characters are drawn from life and are all good, and its direction is frequently superb. There is a wonderful climax in the third act, where Egypt religions in the third act, where Egypt respectives the paws of her father's death but the content of t eives the news of her father's death, but to speak briefly it is a strong play, abound-
