A SOCIAL SUCCESS.

The Hon. Mr. John Clincher had just been elected to Congress.

Washington, and they were arrayed in the finest of lively, new and clean.

With an assurance of victory that proved her a rival of Napoleon.

When Mrs. Clincher was announced in her room.

Her Secretary Simpton blushed red and seemed to be painfully embarrassed.

But it was all changed now. There must be a note of grandeur consistent with the dignity of a Congressman.

At the close of the evening the Hon. Mr. Clincher was in the drawing room.

Her Secretary Simpton blushed red and seemed to be painfully embarrassed.

At the close of the evening the Hon. Mr. Clincher was in the drawing room.

The Hon. John Clincher accepted all the apparent honors of the most gladly at his side.

"Well, I suppose it will take nerve," said Mrs. Clincher, but we always go through with what we say.

"Oh, I'm not bothered half so much about that as I am about what I shall say," exclaimed Mrs. Clincher.

"Diplomacy, I suppose you mean," said Miss Clincher with a superior air.

"Yes, diplomacy, that's what I'm afraid of more than anything else."

"You know," continued Miss Clincher, "that Mr. Struthers, who preceded papa in Congress, tried his level best to get his family into the toniest society."

At each succeeding reception the hold of the Clinchers on 'society' appeared to strengthen.

However, it may be the season ended with a double marriage at the mansion of the Clinchers.

However, nobody paid such assiduous court to Miss Clincher and Miss Valeria as Lord Lockham and Count Liston.

With a few days there was an informal reception at the magnificent residence of Secretary Simpton.

It was near the close of a brilliant season in which the Clinchers merely marched from one victory to another.

A great "paper haul" was on. This was the fashionable substitute for fox chasing.

Letter from Deputy State Supt. Stewart on Physiology and Hygiene.

From the Harrisburg Independent of August 7, we clip the following letter, which cannot fail to be of the deepest interest and of so much value to all who are interested in securing a full and enforced observance of the law.

It is understood that a number of the Harrisburg teachers favored teaching this branch of the common school studies orally, and dispensing with the use of books.
