HORSE AILMENTS.

Another call is given. And glori' once more with angel step. The path which reaches heaven. Our young and gentle tried, whose mane Made bright the summer hour, Amid the bright and sunny days. Has left us with the flowers.

No paling of the cheek of blood. Forewarned as of death. No shadow from the silent land. Fell round our darling's way. The light of her young life went down. The glory of a setting star. Clear, suddenly and still. Pure and sweet, her fair bow seemed Eternal as the sky. And like the hawk's low song, her voice A sound which could not die. And half we deemed she needed not. The changing of her eyes. To the light of her young life. Who walked an angel here.

The blessings of her quiet life. Fell on us like the dew. And good thoughts when her footsteps pressed. Like fairy blossoms grew. Sweet promptings unto kindest deeds. We read her face who reads A true and holy book. We miss her in her home to-night. And by the heart's fire light. We pause beside her door to hear Once more her sweet "good night."

There seems a shadow on the day. Her smile no longer cheers. A dimming of the stars at night. Like eyes that look through tears. Alone unto our Father's will. One thought has reconciled our souls. That "where she is, she is with us." Hath taken home his child.

Old her, O Father, in thine arms. And let her always be A messenger of love between Our human heart and Thee.

—Whittier.

THE WYOMING CAPTIVE.

(Correspondence of Williamsport, Pa. Gazette & Bulletin.)

For rich and well cultivated farms the part of the Washakie Valley about Peru, Idaho, is the most fertile and beautiful in the West. It is a very rich and beautiful little city of ten thousand inhabitants. The Court House is a commanding structure of brick with tower and clock, and a well kept lawn adds to the attractiveness of its surroundings. The streets are wide, the buildings stately and handsome, and everything bears evidence of thrift and prosperity. The main line of the great Washakie Railroad runs through the town. Electric lights illuminate the streets at night and the gas lamps of the houses of the inhabitants. It is brought from the center of the gas field, and less than thirty miles away.

But it is not my intention to write particularly of this charming agricultural region and the prosperous and well-to-do people. I came here for the purpose of visiting some of the descendants of Francis Slocum, the first settler of the State of Idaho, who, by his captivity, wanderings and death, is the most romantic in the annals of Indian history. The Slocum family, readers of our early history will remember, lived at Wyoming in 1777. One day in the summer of that year the streets of the town were filled with the Indians, and they were ordered to march to the bank of the Snake River, and there to be killed and scalped. The mother, with several other children, escaped to the forest. The last she saw of her daughter was when she was thrown across the back of a stalwart Indian and with outstretched arms beckoned her mother for protection. Years rolled away and no tidings were ever heard of the captive child. Many believed her dead, but the mother always entertained the idea that she was alive and well, and would finally return to her. But that hope was never realized. The mother died without ever learning the fate of her child. The streets were passing down the shade of a hillside of life, when a rumor came from the West that a woman was living with the Indians on the banks of the Mississippi, and that she was the daughter of a white man. The discovery was made by George W. Ewing, Indian agent at Loganport, in 1852, fifty-five years after the child had been carried into captivity. He was making a visit to the Indian Agency at Loganport, and was stopped at the cabin of an Indian noticed that the squaw was evidently not of Indian origin, on account of the whiteness of her skin. He interrogated her in the dialect of the tribe, when she admitted to him that she was the daughter of a white man. The name of her father was Slocum, and she was carried away from the Susquehanna when she was a child, and that she had brothers and sisters. That was all she knew of her early life, and she appeared to be greatly alarmed for she had been taught to hate the whites. This was the discovery of her existence made. But I need not stop to tell how the letter Mr. Ewing received concerning her laid for two years in the Lancaster office, how it fell into the hands of John W. Forney, was published, and the facts made known to the world; how she was visited here six years afterwards by her brother and sister, how they finally proved her identity and she was returned to her life, how they were entertained by her, and how they lived with her to return with them to civilization; how she remained at their importunities and preferred to remain with the people who had treated her tenderly and cared for her, how she was happy and contented with her children around her, and wished to spend her last days on the banks of the lovely Mississippi.

A Strange Reunion.

From London Telegraph.

Another illustration of the certainty that truth is stranger than fiction is afforded by the recall to your thoughts of our story which we published yesterday from our Vienna correspondent. The tale comes from Ragusa, not the city in Sicily, but the town which is the capital of the Circle of Ragusa, an administrative division of the province of Dalmatia on the shores of the Adriatic, between Spalato and Boscchia Cattaro. In this picturesque, but poverty-stricken territory, of which the story and calendar still barely produce sufficient grain to feed the inhabitants during three months out of twelve, there lived about twenty years ago a peasant on whom fortune pointed to a son so implacably that in sheer desperation he sought to bet for his miserable condition by emigrating to America. He had a wife, but he did not desert his good woman, when he crossed the ocean in quest of bread, which Ragusa, the impetuous, declined to yield him. He confided his better half to the care of a parish priest, promising to remit money to her so soon as he should be successful in his quest. He was absent for some time, but he did not desert his good woman, when he crossed the ocean in quest of bread, which Ragusa, the impetuous, declined to yield him. He confided his better half to the care of a parish priest, promising to remit money to her so soon as he should be successful in his quest.
