Dr. John Gilkey left Butler for Merida, Tuesday afternoon, after a two months visit to his folks here. He intended taking a train as far as Gineinnati, and then a steam-boat to New Orleans, from which place a regular line of steam-ships runs to Progresso, the seaport of Merida.

Merida, is the capital of Yucatan, one of the provinces of Mexico, and is a city of about 20,000 inhabitants. John joined his father who was practising dentistry there, twelve years ago, and this was his first visit home. He and his father are the only dentists in the city and they have been very successful. The production of "hemp" fibre is what maintains the city. The fibre comes from the Henequin plant, which grows without cultivation; the work is done by the natives for a mere trifle, and this enables the land-owners, who are mostly of Spanish descent, to produce a bale of the fibre for about 50 cents, though its market value is about $3,50. It is shipped to Europe and to the United States for rope making. The price of everything excepting what is produced in the country is high. A barrel of U.
