Dr. John Gilkey left Butler for Merida, Tuesday afternoon, after a two months visit to his folks here. He intended taking a train as far as Cineinnati, and then a steam-boat to New Orleans, from which place a regular line of steam-ships runs to Progresso, the scaport of Merida.

Merida, is the capital of Yucatan, one of the provinces of Mexico, and is a city of about 20,000 inhabitants. John joined his father who was practising dentistry there, twelve years ago, and this was his first visit home. He and his father are the only dentists in the city and they have been very successful. The production of "hemp" fibre is what maintains the city. The fibre comes from the Henequin plant, which grows without cultivation; the work is done by the natives for a mere trifle, and this enables the land-owners, who are mostly of Spanish descent, to produce a bale of the fibre for about 50 cents, though its market value is about $3.50. It is shipped to Europe and to the United States for rope making. The price of everything excepting what is produced in the country is high. A barrel of U. S. flour costs $26, on account of the $16 tariff put on it by the Mexican government, to encourage the straggling wheat production of Central Mexico. Butter, oil and other imported articles are correspondingly high, and thenativesdo without them entirely, and live on corn and the native fruits which are cheap.
