

THE CITIZEN. MISCELLANEOUS.

The Manufacture of Celluloid. The manner in which celluloid is made in France is as follows: A large roll of paper is unwound slowly, and while unwinding is saturated with a mixture of five parts of sulphuric acid and two parts of nitric acid, which is carefully sprayed upon the paper. The effect of this bath is to change the cellulose in the paper into pyroxyline. The next process is the expelling of the excess of acid in the paper by pressure and its washing with plenty of water. It is then reduced to a pulp and bleached, after which it is strained, and then mixed with from 20 to 40 per cent of its weight in water. Then follows another mixing and grinding, after which the pulp is spread in thin sheets, which are put under enormous hydraulic pressure and pressed until it is as dry as tinder. These sheets are then put between heated rollers and come out in quite elastic strips, which are worked up into the various forms in which celluloid is made.
