Just after dusk in the evening two men take their places in the boat and row up one side of Beaver river for a distance of about a mile, keeping the dipped side of the boat as near as possible to the bank. 'This cotrivance can only be used when the river is on the rise, as the fish then congregate jump into the boat After going up, the boat regardless of cost. is rowed to the other side where the same tactics are pursued. No light is used, and the darker the night the better. The parties using this system have been at it for some time, and every night come in with a large extra fine henriettas in black and to the bottom of the boat nearly touching the bed of the river, thus forcing them to jump directly into the boat. There is no law covering this ingenious method of poaching, but it is probable that the Fish Warden will find some method of stopping
