THE BURGLAR, THURSDAY. The Burglar, Thursday.

There is a sort of connecting link between the pathos and humor in the lines provided for little Editha in the play of "The Burglar." The child is made to say, unconsciously, things to the midnight maurander which, while seemingly improbable, are, nevertheless, consistent with the utterings of a precocious youngster. The author of "The Burglar" has given the delightful child-characterization special prominence in his work, and the success of the play is in no small measure due to the introduction of ittle Editha, as her cute and charming abandon affords untole pleasure to an audience chiefly com
