burglary and murder along with Ryan, Spaythe and Wyckoff, but whose innocence is now fully established by Spaythe's con-fession. It is not at all likely that Kromer could have been convicted even if Spaythe had not confessed, as it would have been proven by numerous witnesses that he was at home on the night the murder was com-mitted. It will be a lesson, however, that we hope the young man will profit by and that is, not to cultivate the acquaintance of strangers of wayward habits. A man is generally judged by the company he keeps, and the truth of this is proven in this in-stance, where an innocent man was arrest-ed charged with the highest crime known to our courts on account of being acquaint-ed and associating with the real culprits previous to its occurrence.
