The roads leading northward from Port Arthur were supposed to have been mined by the Chinese and the Japanese commander therefore declined take the risk of marching his troops along them. Consequently, they were compelled to cut roads through the forests to allow of the passage of their artillery, ammunition trains, etc. The march was thus necessarily slow.

It was also said that the Japanese attacked later attacks must have been made and that the outposts were compelled to fall Port Arthur. (FROM HARPER'S WEEKLY.)

Every young American taking an interest in politics should study the story of the rise and fall of David B. Hill. The more ambitious the young man is, the more attentively should be study it. Our political history has not preached a more instructive sermon for many a day. No public man in America represents more distinctly than Hill the class of politicians working only for personal success; no man of that class was more confident of having discovered the true means by which to achieve that success, and few men seemed to be more justified in that confidence than (FROM HARPER'S WEEKLY.) war-ship, the Chen Yaen, Nov. 18th, by an accident. She ran upon one of their own torpredoes in the harbor of Wei-Hsi, and was blown up.

On Friday dispatches were received announcing the capture of Port Arthur, the Chiel Naval Station of China by the Japan ese forces after eight hours of continuous fighting.

The second Japanese srmy, under the command of Field Marshall Count Oyama, minister of war, consisted of about 30,000 men, and when this force arrived off Regents Sword promentory, it was divided into two detachments, one of which, aided by the Japanese fleet, operated against Talienwan, while the other directed its movements against Kin Chow, on the western side of the promontory, some miles north of Port Arthur. Talienwan and Kin Chow were both captured, after which the army again combined and the march on Port Arthur was commenced.
