The roots of melons, cucumbers and squash should now be examined, as the leaves and vines are too strong for the yellow winged insect to do any harm to them, but they will attack the stem close to the ground, depositing their eggs there and in a short space of time these will hatch out white grubs, which will work into the roots and destroy the vines.

This can be prevented by getting some tobacco dust, which only costs 5 cents per pound at any regular seed store. Go over your vines and take away a small portion of the soil from the vine, dust some of the tobacco around the stem and through the vines and you will save your crop. Tobacco dust will not injure the foliage or roots of plants and is considered a good fertilizer.
