CHAPTER XI. The day for the venture came. I had previously instructed my wife to send word she was indisposed and to remain at the hotel.

When daylight came, I stood at the door, but fearing that in the excitement some of the soldiers might see me, I slipped out by the back door.

When I awoke from my nap, I started on a cautious spy out of the land, and saw the river in the distance.

I was very hungry and longed for the cakes and bread I carried, and I thought if I swam the stream they would be soaked and probably lost.

As I passed a house three women came out. They spoke to me, and in my excitement, instead of saying "Good evening," I said "Good morning."

Just then four soldiers came hurrying into the street from the road, and I saw they were white and black.

My desperate situation came out all fear, and I was cold and haughty. Flourishing my pistol, I stepped into the street.

It was a scene of confusion. I saw a man in a white shirt and dark trousers, and I saw a woman in a white dress.

I climbed lightly over the railing, and I saw the river in the distance.

walls or were lying about on boxes and barrels. All eyes were turned on me. I saw myself in a very dangerous position.

I stepped to the counter and asked for bread. Two loaves were given me. I picked up some cakes and paid for them.

meriless judges, but none more terrible than the one which was to fall on us from the lips of their ferocious imitator.

I found my three friends already prisoners there, and a sad party we were. When we said good-bye that night on the beach, we were all weeping.

What a terrible surprise it was to find the man who had been my friend in Newgate! I took it for granted—since the law regarded us as innocent until we were tried and convicted—that we could have been separated.

One of his men, of the name of Perry, had also been in my little room with me, and every morning Curtin would relieve him, remaining until dinner time.

"Just what will I do with him in Boston. Then I'll make him come to the center," remarked an angry man the other day while ranting a theatrical manager who owed him a few hundred dollars for services rendered.
