Much opposition is being developed in Pennsylvania to the attempt to tax life insurance policies. It is the opinion of the Auditor General that a life insurance policy is a form of investment within the meaning of the act of the assembly and he has directed the commissioners of the several counties to require the policy holders to make a personal return of such policies for the purpose of taxation. The insurance companies, as well as the policy holders, are interested as a tax upon policies might tend to diminish their number. Lawyers differ on the question. Some hold that a paid up policy, payable at death, or a policy payable at the expiration of a fixed term years, is an investment. But the general opinion is that a policy the premiums on which continue during life is not an investment within the meaning of the tax law. Between the bicycle and the carriage propelled by power the horse is likely to have a doleful time of it. This useful animal has been able to indulge in some complacent reflections during stormy weather and through the winter months because at such times the bicycle was practically laid up. But the horseless carriage the vehicle propelled by power, is good for all weathers, all roads, and can be maintained by the merest fraction of the cost of a horse and carriage.— To be sure the first cost is greater, but the saving in space, time, strength and labor is past computation. The great competition between the rival firms, the well-equipped shops, which can be turned to various uses, and the necessity for getting about in cold and stormy weather, will prove a stimulus to the power car-Between the bicycle and the will prove a stimulus to the power car-riage, and as the problem of propulsion is already solved, nothing remains but to so cheapen these vehicles that they will come within reach of everybody.
