CAUGHT BY CHANCE.

I tried the handle of the smoking room door and could not effect an entrance. Calling a porter, he opened the door and I went in. He would hardly express an explanation of horror. The body of a heavy looking man was lying against the door, the head and shoulders propped up by a chair.

Next evening I found my friend the superintendent of the house and he told me that the victim of the outrage was not seriously injured, after all. He had regained his consciousness and had been able to tell his story.

He had that evening completed a very satisfactory business transaction. He was in the smoking room, and he had just finished reading a paper.

He was walking the Barnardston brothers, a pair of acrobats, whose contortions and feats of strength were the main attraction of the show.

I was thoroughly enjoying this exhibition of strength and agility when my friend remarked: "These acrobats fellows would make short work of your slight figure if they were to come."

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."

"What about the general, mother?" he asked. "Well, I'm afraid we can't get that kind of an all."

"I got into a morbid habit of strutting about in the neighborhood of the street theater, and for I still took an interest in the doings of the Barnardston brothers. One night at 10 o'clock I was going down South street on my way home."

KATIE'S CATCH.

"Oh, dear, I am so tired, so very tired, toiling all day and over half the night for barely enough to keep soul and body together. I don't know where I am, and I don't know where I'm going."

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."

MENTAL DYSPEPSIA.

When in life we come to a realization of the shortness of time, it is discouraging to find that we have neglected to read and study at the proper age to do so.

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."

DAIRY & CREAMERY.

A NEW YORK DAIRY FARM. Work and Pains which Have Made It Beautiful and Prosperous.

A correspondent of the Rural New Yorker describes a model dairy farm in New York state. Some of the extracts from his sketch are here given, with an illustration of a new kind of stanchion which the owner of the farm invented to fasten his cows.

During the summer the staves shrunk, and he had to tighten the hoops as he had provided for with clamp screws, but the cement held the bottom from closing in, and he had to cut out the cement around the inside in order to let the bottom close up. He would, if necessary, send the staves on a perfectly flat and smooth surface, and, if necessary, around the inside in order to let the bottom close up.

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."

SCIENTIFIC COW FEEDING.

What has often puzzled practical men in scientific studies was the impossibility of altering the composition of milk by feeding any particular food. It is now known that the composition of milk is determined by the nature of the cow's blood.

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."

DAIRY & CREAMERY.

What This Breed Is in Switzerland and Germany. A description given some time since in The Rural New Yorker contains the most intelligible account we have seen of the famous general purpose cattle of central Europe.

The writer, Mr. F. Sarg, a farmer in Germany, says: They are of rapid growth, early development, very hardy, their Alpine pasturing producing heavy bone and a deep chest, giving great freedom from tuberculosis. At the same time they are excellent milk cows, attaining 10,000 pounds of milk with up to 8.2 per cent of fat. Large dairies with well balanced cows, bring up their families and some young stock too. The oxen of this breed are famous for their working powers, docility, endurance and rapid gain.

"What a go, young man," he said. "Your idea won't wash. The Barnardston brothers were here on the 10th—the night of the crime—and they were here on every night at 9:30 at the Star."
