CHAPTER VII.

This premature declaration of feelings which I had sworn to myself to suppress was brought about partly by the spring fever of the season, partly by the excitement of the moment, and partly by the encouragement of the man who was now my friend.

Mark Gerard, the man who was now my friend, was a young man of about twenty-five years of age, of a fair complexion, and of a pleasant countenance. He was of a medium height, and of a well-proportioned figure. He was a member of the law, and was now in the city of Philadelphia, where he was engaged in the study of the law.

"You are a very good man," said Mark Gerard, "and I am very glad to see you. I have been thinking of you very much lately, and I have been wondering how you are getting on. I hope you are well, and I hope you are happy."

"I am very well, and I am very happy," said the man who was now my friend. "I have been thinking of you very much lately, and I have been wondering how you are getting on. I hope you are well, and I hope you are happy."

"I am very well, and I am very happy," said the man who was now my friend. "I have been thinking of you very much lately, and I have been wondering how you are getting on. I hope you are well, and I hope you are happy."

I had to have a partner; a man whom I could talk to, and control; a conservative man, who would furnish the motive power, the running gear, and there, and let me do the planning in peace. Such a fellow was right in my hand—poor Ferdinand Perkins. It must have been a heavy disappointment to Demetrius, but he stood it like a Trojan. Then came the murder. Demetrius himself applied for his present post, which he has kept. As you say, he's a rich man. He has no lack of money.

"I sit with Burlington to-night, Mr. Gerard."

"Yes, yes. He winced at the man's name. 'I don't envy you. Well, I'll go to bed. To-morrow I shall spend with Mark.'
