interests in the steel and coke companies."

"You, Mr. Phipps," continued Mr. Dill, "put on your sheet of paper what Mr. Frick considers a fair valuation of his interests. I infer he has informed you on that point."

Mr. Phipps nodded assent.

Then Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Phipps each made some figures, which Mr. Dill declines to make public, and submitted them to the lawyer. Mr. Dill then handed Mr. Phipps estimate to Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Carnegie's to Mr. Phipps with the remark:

"Do you consider that a fair figure?"
"I do' answered Mr. Carnegie.
"So do I," responded Mr. Phipps.
"That is well," remarked Mr. Dill, "because it disposes of what might have been a serious obstacle to a possible settlement."

"In this case," said Mr. Dill, "I was the fool, and glad to serve in that capacity because this country cannot afford to have such vast interests as those of Mr. Carnegie and Mr Frick at odds."

Mr. Dill suggested that a new corporation be formed, to be known as the Carnegie company, and organized under the laws of New Jersey. This was acquiesced in, and the conference came to a close.
