In Columbia and Venezuela.

The Colombian Congress to which the Panama Canal treaty, which our own Senate is wrestling with, will be submitted, was elected during the week. It is not positively known, or it has not at least been positively stated, whether a majority of the members are or are not in favor of approving the contract into which the government had previously entered, but the supporters of the treaty profess to have no fears upon the subject. They say that the opposition is dying out, and that at Bożota, where public opinion is most influential, the feeling is gaining ground that the treaty represents the very best bargain that Columbia can hope to make and that to reject it would be an extremely foolish piece of business.

In this connection it appears that the

In this connection it appears that the course pursued by Mr. Morgan has not been without some good result. It has convinced many Colombians who had their doubts upon the point that there is a conflict of judgment in the United States as to the value to this country of the proposed arrangement. Had the treaty been ratified at once without opposition the cry would have been that the American Government was eager to consummate what it recognized as an ample, the duty on cotton goods has been advanced from 60 to 100 per cent. ad valorem; on hardware from 50 to 100 per cent. and on wines and spirits from 100 to 250 per cent. A country which is in the straits indicated by these figures is not likely to balk at a bargain which will place ten million dollars in its treasury.

There has been scarcely any news from Venezuela, but that little has not been encouraging. The insurrection against the Castro regime is still going stated and was also treating a young stated and was also treating a young been encouraging. The insurrection against the Castro regime is still going on, and while the insurgents are apparently unable to make any substantial progress, the government is equally unable to reduce them to submission. The situation looks like a case of stalemate, the more so as it is reported that Congress cannot be called together for the lack of a quorum. In Venezuela, as in Colombia, the financial crisis is acute. Not only have the duties on imports been materially advanced, but such heavy export duties have been imposed that merchants are finding it imposed that the case that that previously stated and was also treating a young intended and manter that there was no truth in the shotgun ma posed that merchants are finding it im-
