—Kansas papers are poking fun at the divorce laws of the Sunflower State. One most excellant stipulation provides that a divorce shall not become final until six months after the decree has been granted. This operates to prevent un seemly haste on the part of the divorced in remarrying, which has become such a scandal in some parts of the East. The Chanute Daily Blade is inclined to regard this section of the law with undue levity. It cites the case of an Emporia woman, who was granted a divorce from her husband about two months ago. Recently she noticed that he was reading up with another woman, taking her to church and buying her peanuts and popcorn. She says she is going into whether the man has a right to "keep company" with another woman before his divorce becomes final.
