in the appurtenances of the home tends to personal refinement. It is by our being reached and impressed by beauty in our surroundings that we differ from animals and savages. If the world hadn't been covered with blossoms there would have been no polite nations, no ladies and gentlemen. If there had been no green fields there would have been no civilization. And it is by giving to our indoor habitation the light and loveliness of the garden that we are kept from returning to barbarism. We de not place parlor furniture in the shed or barn, because the animals, like plants and vegetables, are without sentiment—without any germs of civility or refinement. The ox cannot be quickened into delight and courtesy by the sight of roses and morning glories. He can't enjoy beauty any more than the trees can enjoy music. There can be no such a thing as a civilized animal, because the animals can never be blessed with happy and enlightened feelings. You may trim the barn like a mansion, you may make it glitter with mahogany and marble, you may surround the horse with splendid pictures and paintings, but you cannot make him smile or bow to other horses. The appreciation of beautiful environment is given to human beings alone. It is given to them as a means of social elevation and improvement, and when a savage buys a rug or sofa for his wigwam he ceases to be a savage. Of course a refined home does not mean a costly or showy home. It means a home marked by taste and comeliness in its appointments."—Artisan-Record.
